Michael C. Seeborg
Robert S. Eckley Distinguished
Professor of Economics

Recipient of the 1999 DuPont Award
For Teaching Excellence

"My greatest pleasure," said Michael C. Seeborg, the 1999 recipient of the DuPont Award for Teaching Excellence at Illinois Wesleyan University, "is working one-on-one with students.

"I really enjoy working with students on research projects," Seeborg added. "To see students' critical thinking skills improve and mature, brings a lot of satisfaction."

Seeborg's approach to teaching makes economics much more than the "dismal science." He humanizes economics by teaching courses like "The Economics of Race and Poverty" and "The Economics of Race and Gender Differentials," making these courses come alive by using cities like Chicago as his teaching and research laboratories.

Referring to a May Term '98 course on race and gender differentials, Seeborg said: "We had so many students in the class, we had to charter a bus to travel to Chicago."

On that trip, Seeborg explained, students visited many low-income neighborhoods to help them "comprehend what it's like to live every day in fear and poverty."

Seeborg's teaching technique frequently taps into the expertise of IWU alumni.

"We also have presentations by IWU alumni interested in the economic development of areas like Cabrini-Green, as well as panel discussions initiated by the Illinois Wesleyan Minority Alumni Network," Seeborg explained. "It makes a great difference for students to see lives that have been affected by poverty and violence. It makes the theories we study in the classroom much more meaningful."

Labor economics and industrial relations are among Seeborg's areas of concentration.

Seeborg earned a bachelor of arts degree in economics (1969) from the University of Oregon and a doctorate (1976) from the University of Utah.

He taught in a master of business administration program in Germany, sponsored by the University of Utah, and was a faculty member at Ball State University for 13 years.

Seeborg is the author of numerous articles on human resources and the American labor market. He also has helped launch a number of economics journals, including an on-line publication—University Avenue Undergraduate Journal of Economics—last year with a $10,000 grant from the Calvin K. Kazanjian Economics Foundation. It is the only completely on-line undergraduate economics journal in the world. The journal involves students at IWU and Illinois State University, who write and edit articles, plan editions, and work with Internet technology. He also spearheaded development of IWU's undergraduate journal, The Park Place Economist, a business journal at Ball State University, and an economics journal at the University of Utah.

Reflecting on what it takes to be an outstanding teacher, Seeborg said: "It varies from individual-to-individual. There is no single formula. All teachers have strengths and weaknesses. However, effective teachers have to have a passion about their discipline and a passion about learning through dialogue with students."

A special interest of Seeborg's is working with upper-level students on research projects. His teaching philosophy doesn't draw a line in the sand between teaching and research. Dividing teaching and research, he believes, is a "false dichotomy."

"The two go together," Seeborg said, referring to teaching and research. "If you're excited about learning, you'll be excited about research."
