NARENDRA JAGGI

Narendra Jaggi is professor and chair of the Department of Physics at Illinois Wesleyan where he has taught since 1991.

A native of India, Jaggi received degrees in physics from Ranchi University and from the University of Bombay where he earned the Ph.D. After working in the Department of Atomic Energy in Bombay, he pursued a postdoctoral fellowship at Northwestern University, then joined the physics department at Northeastern University in Boston before coming to Illinois Wesleyan.

In 2003, Jaggi was named the Illinois Professor of the Year by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and the Council for Advancement and Support of Education (CASE). That honor came a year after Illinois Wesleyan students elected him as the winner of the annual “Professor of the Year” award presented by the Student Senate.

A materials physicist by training, Jaggi teaches physics and conducts research in the areas of materials physics and artificial societies. He has co-authored 37 research papers in refereed journals in both physics and sociology.

One example of both the interdisciplinary nature of Jaggi’s research and his involvement with undergraduates is a paper that he co-authored with Alexander Laurie, a 2003 graduate of the University. Their paper explores issues of racial segregation and was published in the journal Urban Studies.

In addition to his teaching and research, Jaggi is co-founder of the Sports and Scholars Program, a summer academic enrichment experience that has been recognized as a model for exemplifying “university-industry-community” cooperation. He also serves as faculty adviser for a variety of campus organizations, including Student Senate, the South Asian Student Society, and the Society of Physics Students, and is a Faculty Visitor to the University’s Board of Trustees.

In describing his teaching philosophy, Jaggi has said: “I believe that genuine affection and enthusiasm for learning can be infectious. I believe that students can learn from each other, and I from them.... I smile whenever my students can see through the fog, and can see that they are seeing through. Such moments build the confidence of the students and enable them to take responsibility for their own learning. They also make teaching the joyous vocation that it is!”
