The Artless Jew and the Iconophobic Christian: An Artistic Approach to the 'Parting of the Ways'

Kristin Zavislak, '09
Illinois Wesleyan University

Nancy Sultan, Faculty Advisor
Illinois Wesleyan University

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.iwu.edu/jwprc

This Event is brought to you for free and open access by The Ames Library, the Andrew W. Mellon Center for Curricular and Faculty Development, the Office of the Provost and the Office of the President. It has been accepted for inclusion in Digital Commons @ IWU by the faculty at Illinois Wesleyan University. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@iwu.edu.
©Copyright is owned by the author of this document.
After the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem in 70 CE only two major divisions of Second Temple Judaism survived: one that would eventually become Rabbinic Judaism and one that would transform into a completely separate religion, Christianity. Without a doubt these two religions grew out of one, but when and how this happened is a topic of hot debate among scholars today. These scholars often use the biased accounts of first century historians, as well as the New Testament scriptures, in an attempt to answer these questions, but they’re only looking at words. Through an examination of the catacombs and the buildings found at Dura-Europos, the earliest examples of ‘Jewish’ and ‘Christian’ art, I believe the answers to the questions of when and how the Ways finally parted can be best found by looking instead at pictures. In particular, how one motif is interpreted by both Christian and Jewish artists within their most private spaces of worship: Abraham’s sacrifice of Isaac.