The Thaw, the period of Soviet history immediately following the death of Joseph Stalin in 1953, was a fascinating time for culture and government. Until recently, there has not been significant scholarly attention devoted to this period in cultural history. A new examination of memoirs from writers, dissidents, and Party leaders shows that this period was much more complex than some historians previously thought. The Thaw was neither a true liberalization nor was it a government-facilitated catharsis for the Russian Intelligentsia. Instead, it witnessed the re-emergence of a number of ideologies, each of which proposed a different way forward. However, these competing philosophies were all marked by a distinctly Russian view of the world, a view marked by binary opposition, disavowal of the recent past, and belief that a glorious future awaits. Using memoirs and literature from this period, this project will examine the changes in the Soviet Union in light of this cultural phenomenon.
